

CRS Report for Congress

Censure of the President by the Congress

September 29, 1998

Jack Maskell
Legislative Attorney
American Law Division

Congressional Research Service • The Library of Congress

Congressional Operations Briefing— Capitol Hill Workshop

Congressional Operations Briefing and Seminar

The definitive overview of how Congress works.

This intensive course is offered as a 3-day public Briefing and as a tailored on-site 3, 4 or 5-day program.

Public Briefings are offered throughout the year in Washington, DC.
Space is limited.

Dates, Agenda, Previous Faculty, and Secure Online Registration:

TCNCHW.com

On-site Congressional Briefings and Capitol Hill Workshops for agencies:

CLCHW.com

202-678-1600    TheCapitol.Net

Non-partisan training and publications that show how Washington works.™

PO Box 25706, Alexandria, VA 22313-5706
202-678-1600 • www.thecapitol.net

TheCapitol.Net is on the
GSA Schedule, 874-4,
for custom on-site training.
GSA Contract GS02F0192X

Courses approved for CEUs from George Mason University

All of our courses and workshops include extensive interaction with our faculty, making our courses and workshops both educational as well as mini-consulting sessions with substantive experts.

Our Upcoming Schedule of Courses can be seen online on our web site or at TCNCourses.com.

All of our courses and any combination of their topics can be customized for on-site training for your organization—we are on GSA Advantage, Contract GS02F0192X.

thecapitol.net
202-678-1600

Contents

Background/Summary ..... 1

Censure ..... 2

Fines ..... 6

Bills of Attainder ..... 7

Diminution of Salary ..... 9

Voluntary Acceptance of Recommended Penalty ..... 10

ABSTRACT

Exploring a possible compromise between an impeachment and taking no congressional action, certain Members of Congress and congressional commentators have suggested a congressional "censure" of the President to express the Congress' disapproval of the President's conduct which has been the subject of an ongoing independent counsel investigation. This report provides an overview and discussion of the legal basis and congressional precedents regarding a congressional "censure" of the President.

Censure of the President by the Congress

Summary

There is no express constitutional provision which authorizes Congress to “censure” the President or any other executive branch official. A censure of the President does not appear to be part of the impeachment process, which may extend only to removal from office and disqualification from serving in a federal position. It is clearly not part of Congress’ express authority to “punish” its own Members (Article I, Section 5, clause 2), nor would it be in most cases within the inherent powers of legislatures to protect the dignity, privileges and proceedings of the institution and its Members. Rather, a “censure” would most likely be in the nature of “sense of the Congress,” or sense of the Senate or House, resolutions which have developed in congressional practice as vehicles to state opinions or facts in non-binding, nonlegislative instruments. The House and Senate have, on rare occasions, and mostly in the 19th Century, expressed their disapproval, reproof or censure of executive officials, including the President, or certain of their actions,

Similar to a censure of the President, there is no express constitutional authority to “fine” the President or any other individual outside of Congress, or to require anyone outside of Congress to make a monetary restitution. However, unlike a censure or other “sense of” the House or Senate resolution used to express an opinion, a mandatory fine legislated by Congress against a particular individual may run afoul of the “Bill of Attainder” Clause of the Constitution, as well as, if directed at the President, raise issues concerning the constitutional prohibition on diminishing the salary of the President. Also, unlike censure or other statement of disapproval formally expressed by Congress, there have been found no precedents for the Congress to legislate or formally adopt a resolution expressly directing a specified individual, who is not a Member of Congress, to pay a fine or a restitution to the Government.

It may at least be theoretically possible for an agreement to be reached between the President and the Congress for the President to voluntarily “accept” a congressional statement, suggestion and/or direction concerning particular restitution or other act of contrition, and not to challenge the authority or constitutionality of any such legislative statement or act. In such a case, as a practical matter, it may be difficult for anyone other than the individual actually aggrieved or harmed (that is, the President), to possess the requisite legal standing to challenge in court such an arrangement on the basis of an alleged absence of legislative authority or violation of constitutional precepts. Such legal questions of authority, power and standing aside, however, there may be implications for policy and precedent which the Congress may wish to consider and weigh in adopting a congressional response to alleged wrongdoing by an executive official, particularly the President, when such response is other than through impeachment, and is not provided for in the Constitution.

Censure of the President by the Congress

Exploring a possible compromise between an impeachment and taking no congressional action, certain Members of Congress and congressional commentators have suggested a congressional “censure” of the President to express the Congress’ disapproval of the President’s conduct which has been the subject of an ongoing independent counsel investigation. This report provides an overview of the legal basis and congressional precedents regarding a congressional “censure” of the President.

Background/Summary

A “censure” is commonly defined to mean: “The formal resolution of a legislative, administrative, or other body reprimanding a person, normally one of its own members, for specified conduct.”<sup>1</sup> In Congress, censures are usually simple resolutions of the House or Senate formally adopted by a vote of that body, and expressing some form of disapproval or other term of rebuke or condemnation concerning a Member’s conduct which bears generally on a “breach of the rights and privileges” of the institution.<sup>2</sup> These censures of Members are implemented under the express authority in the Constitution, at Article I, Section 5, clause 2, for each House of Congress to “punish” one of its own Members.

A House, Senate or congressional “censure” of the President, unlike a congressional punishment of one of its own Members, or an impeachment and trial of the President in the legislature,<sup>3</sup> does not have an express constitutional basis. Although there is no express constitutional provision regarding censure of an executive officer, there is also no express constitutional impediment for the Congress, or either House of Congress, to adopt a resolution expressing its opinion, reproof, disapprobation or censure of an individual in the Government, or of the conduct of the individual, and, in fact, each House of Congress has on infrequent occasions adopted such resolutions in the past. Resolutions expressing the House’s or Senate’s disapproval, censure or reproof of an individual or of his or her conduct have on occasion been adopted, for example, by the Senate (although later expunged) regarding President Jackson in 1834, and by the House in 1860 with regard to President Buchanan. Resolutions disapproving of conduct or censuring the President

---

<sup>1</sup> Black’s Law Dictionary, at 224, 6th Edition (1990).

<sup>2</sup> Deschler’s Precedents of the U.S. House of Representatives, Volume 3, Ch. 12, § 16; Riddick & Fruman, Riddick’s Senate Procedure, 270-273 (1992).

<sup>3</sup> United States Constitution, Article I, Section 2, clause 5; Article I, Section 3, clauses 6 and 7; Article II, Section 4. For a discussion of impeachment procedures and precedents, see CRS Report No. 98-186A, “Impeachment: An Overview of Constitutional Provisions, Procedure, and Practice,” February 27, 1998.

or other executive official, like similar “sense of the Congress” resolutions, or sense of the House or Senate resolutions, would have no particular legal or constitutional consequence,<sup>4</sup> but may have political and/or historical import.

In discussing a potential “censure” or other statement of disapproval directed at the President by the Congress, some have also suggested a “fine” of the President, or a requirement for the President to make monetary restitution for the costs of the independent counsel investigation since January of 1998. Like a censure of the President, there is no express constitutional authority to fine the President or any other individual outside of Congress. However, unlike a censure or other sense of the House or Senate resolution used to express an opinion, a mandatory fine legislated by Congress against a particular individual may run afoul of the “Bill of Attainder” Clause of the Constitution. It is at least theoretically possible that an agreement might be arranged between the President and the Congress for the President to voluntarily “accept” a congressional statement, suggestion and/or direction concerning particular restitution or other act of contrition, and not to challenge the authority of any such legislative statement or act. In such a case, as a practical matter, and regardless of the potentially significant implications for policy or precedent, it may be difficult for anyone, other than the individual actually aggrieved or harmed (that is, the President), to possess the requisite legal standing to challenge in court such an arrangement on the basis of an alleged absence of legislative authority or violation of constitutional precepts.

Censure

In early congressional considerations some Members of Congress, in their opposition to resolutions which declared either an opinion of praise or disapproval of the executive, cited the lack of express constitutional grant of authority for the House or the Senate to state an opinion on the conduct or propriety of an executive officer in the form of a formal resolution of censure or disapproval.<sup>5</sup> Others argued that impeachment was the proper, and exclusive, constitutional response for the Congress to entertain when the conduct of federal civil officers is called into question, rather than a resolution of censure.<sup>6</sup> Concerning judicial officers, the House has historically

---

<sup>4</sup> Deschler's Precedents, supra at Volume 7, § 5 (Concurrent Resolutions), and § 6 (Simple Resolutions); Brown, House Practice, 104th Cong., 2d Sess. at 161 (1996).

<sup>5</sup> II Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives, §1569, pp. 1029-1030: “It was objected that the Constitution did not include such expressions of opinion among the duties of the House ....” (Citing debate and vote on a resolution of approval of the President’s conduct, which was laid on the table, 20 Annals of the Congress, 11th Cong., 2nd Sess., at 92-118, 134-151, 156-161, 164-182, 187-217, 219 (1809)).

<sup>6</sup> Note discussion of House resolution in 1867 expressing opinion on the unfitness for the office of Mr. Henry Smyth (II Hinds' Precedents, supra at §1581, pp. 1035-1036), and 1924 Senate resolution indicating its sense that the President “immediately request the resignation” of the Secretary of Navy. 65 Congressional Record, 68th Cong., 1st Sess., 2223-2245 (1924). Both of these resolutions were objected to by some Members as interfering with the President’s prerogatives in appointments and removals of executive officials, and the latter rejected attempts to consider a “censure” motion of federal judges offered by the Judiciary Committee as an alternative to articles of impeachment.<sup>7</sup>

(continued...)

Both the House and the Senate have in the past, however, adopted resolutions or statements expressing their opinion, disapproval, or censure of a Government official. An expression of censure of a federal officer by the Congress is not an “impeachment” of a civil officer under Article I, Section 2, clause 5 and Section 3, clause 6;<sup>8</sup> nor is it a “punishment” of one of the House’s or Senate’s own Members under Article I, Section 5, clause 2. Furthermore, a censure would also not, in most cases, appear to be within those inherent or implicit authorities typically imputed to American legislative institutions, such as those recognized in contempt and other procedures to protect the dignity and integrity of the institution and its members and proceedings.<sup>9</sup> Rather, it has become accepted congressional practice to employ a simple resolution of one House of Congress, or a concurrent resolution by both Houses, for certain nonlegislative matters, such as to express the opinion or the sense of the Congress or of one House of Congress on a public matter,<sup>10</sup> and a resolution action as labeling with a “brand of shame” an individual in the Government without conducting impeachment proceedings. See discussion in Fisher, “Congress and the Removal Power,” in Congress & the Presidency, Volume 10, at 67-68 (1983).

<sup>6</sup>(...continued)

<sup>7</sup> The censure of U.S. District Court Judge Harold Louderback, recommended in a Judiciary Committee report in 1933 instead of impeachment, was objected to, for example, by Rep. Earl Michener of Michigan, who explained: “I do not believe that the constitutional power of impeachment includes censure.” The recommendation was not approved, and the House adopted as a substitute an amendment impeaching the judge. 3 Deschler’s Precedents, supra at Ch. 14, § 1.3, p. 400. In other instances recommendations of censure of judges, as alternatives to impeachment, were made by the Judiciary Committee, but not acted on by the House. Id. at 400-401; III Hind’s Precedents, supra at §§ 2519, 2520.

<sup>8</sup> See 3 Deschler’s Precedents, supra at Ch. 14, § 1.

<sup>9</sup> Note, generally, discussion of “privileges” and “incidental powers” of legislatures, Cushing, Elements of the Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies in the United States of America, 245-255, 255-272 (1856); see specifically as to inherent contempt authority, Anderson v. Dunn, 19 U.S. 204 (1821). Since such action does not bear upon the proceedings and privileges of the House, and is not part of impeachment, such a resolution would generally not be considered to be a privileged resolution. See 3 Deschler’s Precedents, supra at Chapter 14, § 1, p. 401.

<sup>10</sup> “Simple resolutions are used in dealing with nonlegislative matters such as expressing opinions or facts .... Except as specifically provided by law, they have no legal effect, and require no action by the other House. Containing no legislative provisions, they are not presented to the President of the United States for his approval, as in the case of bills and joint resolutions.” Deschler’s Precedents, Volume 7, § 6. “[Concurrent resolutions] are not used in the adoption of general legislation. ... [They] are used in ... expressing the sense of Congress on propositions .... A concurrent resolution does not involve an exercise of the legislative power under article I of the Constitution in which the President must participate.” Id. at § 5. Brown, House Practice, supra at 161: “Simple or concurrent resolutions are used ... to express facts or opinions, or to dispose of some other nonlegislative matter.” See also Riddick & Fruman, Riddick’s Senate Procedure, 1202 (1992).

of censure would appear to be in the nature of such a “sense of Congress” or sense of the House or Senate resolution.

Periodically during the nineteenth century Congress debated and considered the censure of a President of the United States. In the instances reviewed, the considerations have been in one House of Congress only, rather than concurrently in both the House and Senate. The Senate had adopted a resolution in 1834 stating that certain conduct of President Andrew Jackson, involving a policy dispute concerning the removal of the Secretary of the Treasury and the question of the availability of certain documents, was “in derogation” of the Constitution or the laws of the nation.<sup>11</sup> Three years later, however, upon the strong protestation of the President concerning the prerogatives of his office, and upon the President’s political allies regaining control of the Senate, the Senate revoked and expunged that resolution.<sup>12</sup> The Senate resolution concerning President Jackson did not expressly contain the word “censure” or other specific word of condemnation, and some critics of Congress’ authority to adopt such resolutions of censure have categorized the 1834 resolution as one other than a “censure” of the executive.<sup>13</sup>

In 1860, the House of Representatives adopted a resolution stating that the President’s conduct was deserving of its “reproof,” in a matter concerning the conduct of President Buchanan and his Secretary of the Navy in allowing political considerations and alleged campaign contribution “kickbacks” to influence the letting of Government contracts to political supporters, rather than the lowest bidder.<sup>14</sup> After debating both the substance of the charges and the authority of the House to adopt such a resolution, characterized by one Member as “censur[ing] indiscriminately the President of the United States and the Secretary of Navy,”<sup>15</sup> the House adopted the resolution 106-61.<sup>16</sup> It may also be noted that, although not a resolution of censure or disapproval, the House in 1842 adopted a report from a select committee, to which the President’s veto message had been referred, which strongly criticized the actions

---

<sup>11</sup> The resolution of March 28, 1834, read as follows: “Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both.” Note II Hinds’ Precedents, supra at §1591, p. 1040.

<sup>12</sup> Register of Debates, 24th Cong., 2d Sess. 379-418, 427-506 (1837), see discussion in Fisher, Constitutional Conflicts Between Congress and the President, 54-55 (4th ed.1997).

<sup>13</sup> Congressional Globe, 36th Congress, 1st Session, 2938-2939, June 13, 1860. Referring to the Senate resolution concerning President Jackson, Representative Bobcock noted: “You will observe that in this resolution there is no direct declaration of censure, and no impeachment of the motives of the President. It was simply a declaration that his act was not in conformity with the Constitution and the laws of the land.”

<sup>14</sup> “Resolved, That the President and Secretary of the Navy, by receiving and considering the party relations of bidders for contracts with the United States, and the effect of awarding contracts upon pending elections, have set an example dangerous to the public safety, and deserving the reproof of this House.” Congressional Globe, 36th Congress, 1st Sess., 2951, June 13, 1860.

<sup>15</sup> Id. at 2951, Mr. Clark of Missouri.

<sup>16</sup> Id. at 2951.

The House of Representatives and Senate Explained

Congressional Procedure

A Practical Guide to the Legislative Process in the U.S. Congress

Richard A. Arenberg

of President Tyler for “gross abuse of constitutional power and bold assumption of powers never vested in him by any law”; for having “assumed ... the whole Legislative power to himself, and ... levying millions of money upon the people, without any authority of law”; and for the “abusive exercise of the constitutional power of the President to arrest the action of Congress upon measures vital to the welfare of the people ...”<sup>17</sup>

Other resolutions of disapproval or censure of a President have been debated on the floor of the House or Senate. The House debated the issue of a resolution criticizing President John Adams in 1800 because of a communication from the President to a judge, which the President’s critics deemed to be a “dangerous interference of the Executive with Judicial decisions,” concerning a celebrated deportation case.<sup>18</sup> The Senate in 1862 also debated, and tabled a motion for censure of James Buchanan, who had recently been President of the United States, for alleged failures while President to take the necessary action to prevent the secession from the Union of several southern states.<sup>19</sup> More recently, a censure resolution concerning President Richard Nixon was introduced in the House in 1974 but received no floor consideration.<sup>20</sup>

The House or the Senate has also from time to time censured or expressed its disapprobation of other executive officers, or of their conduct, in the form of a resolution adopted by the body. Some resolutions merely found misconduct on the part of an executive officer and urged the President to seek the officer’s resignation, without expressing a specific term of censure or condemnation. For example, after having conducted investigations into the conduct of the administration of the New

---

<sup>17</sup> Journal of the House of Representatives, 27th Cong., 2d Sess., 1343, 1346-1352, August 17, 1842.

<sup>18</sup> 10 Annals of Congress 532-33, 542-578, 584-619 (1800), discussed in Neuman, “Habeas Corpus, Executive Detention, and the Removal of Aliens,” 98 Columbia Law Review 961, 995-996 (1998).

<sup>19</sup> II Hinds’ Precedents, supra at §1571, p. 1030, citing Congressional Globe, 37th Congress, 3rd Session pp. 101-102, December 16, 1862.

<sup>20</sup> See H. Res. 1288, 93rd Congress, 2d Session. See discussion at 120 Congressional Record 26820, August 5, 1974. The resolution stated:

Whereas the people have the right to expect from the President of the United States high moral standards and personal example, as well as great diligence in the exercise of official responsibilities and obligations;

And whereas, Richard M. Nixon, in his conduct of the office of President - despite great achievements in foreign policy which are highly beneficial to every citizen and indeed to all people of the world - (1) has shown insensitivity to the moral demands, lofty purpose and ideals of the high office he holds in trust, and (2) has, through negligence and maladministration, failed to prevent his close subordinates and agents from committing acts of grave misconduct obstruction and impairment of justice, abuse and undue concentration of power, and contravention of the laws governing agencies of the Executive Branch;

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the House of Representatives that Richard M. Nixon should be and he is hereby censured for said moral insensitivity, negligence and maladministration.

York custom-house by Mr. Henry Smyth, and finding that “there is not sufficient time prior” to adjournment to finish the matter, the House expressed in a resolution “Henry A. Smyth’s unfitness to hold the office,” and recommended that he “should be removed from the office of collector.”<sup>21</sup> Similarly, the Senate in 1924, during the Teapot Dome investigation passed a resolution indicating its sense that the President “immediately request the resignation” of the Secretary of Navy.<sup>22</sup> In 1896, the House adopted a resolution where it found that a United States Ambassador, by his speech and conduct “has committed an offense against diplomatic propriety and an abuse of the privileges of his exalted position,” and therefore, “as the immediate representatives of the American people, and in their names, we condemn and censure the said utterances of Thomas F. Bayard.”<sup>23</sup> The Senate adopted a resolution in 1886 in which it expressed its “condemnation” of President’s Cleveland’s Attorney General A.H. Garland concerning his refusal to provide certain records and papers to the Senate about the removal from office of a district attorney by the President.<sup>24</sup>

Fines

As a general proposition it may be stated that there is no authority for the Congress, or either House of Congress, to levy a mandatory fine against an individual (or to otherwise “punish” an individual or person) absent some recognized legislative power, such as the express constitutional authority in Article I, Section 5, clause 2 of the Constitution allowing either House of Congress to “punish” one if its own Members.<sup>25</sup> The noted parliamentary and legislative authority, Luther Stearns

---

<sup>21</sup> Congressional Globe, 40th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 255-256, 282-285, 394-395 (1867).

<sup>22</sup> 65 Congressional Record, 68th Cong., 1st Sess., 2223-2245, February 11, 1924. See discussion in footnote 6, supra.

<sup>23</sup> 28 Congressional Record, 54th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 3034, March 20, 1896.

<sup>24</sup> 17 Congressional Record, 49th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 1584-1591, 2784-2810, March 26, 1886: “Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January, and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, is in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.” The precedents and incidents provided are intended to be examples of House or Senate precedents, and are not designed to be a definitive list of all resolutions of disapproval of executive officials that may have been adopted or considered by either House.

<sup>25</sup> “Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.” Under this authority each House of Congress has disciplined its own Members (in addition to expulsion, censure, or [in the House] reprimand) by way of fines or the ordering of monetary restitution. See, for example, S. Rpt. No. 101-382, 101st Cong., 2d Sess., at 14-15 (1990); H. Res. 2, 91st Cong. (1969), discussed in Deschler’s Precedents, supra, at Ch.12, § 17, pp. 203-204; H.R. Rpt. No. 96-351, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., at 20 (1979); H.R. Rpt. No. 101-610, 101st Cong., 2d Sess., at 55 (1990); H.R. Rpt. No. 105-1, 105th Cong., 1st Sess., at 2-3 (1997). Note also Rules, House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, Rule 25(e), 105th Cong. (1997).

Cushing, in discussing the general and traditional powers of legislative institutions in the United States, explained in his 1856 treatise:

In England, both houses of parliament were anciently in the practice of imposing the payment of a fine by way of punishment; and this is understood, at the present day to be the practice of the lords; but the commons have appeared to long since waived or abandoned this form of punishment, and it has even been laid down that they now have no such power. In this country, with one or two exceptions, in which there is a special constitutional provision to that effect, the legislative assemblies are not authorized to impose a fine by way of punishment.<sup>26</sup>

Bills of Attainder

No specific “penalty” or “punishment” necessarily follows the adoption of a resolution which merely expresses a “censure” or states another term of disapproval or condemnation of an individual, other than the statement itself and the potential collateral or incidental political damage that might be incurred as a result of Congress’ expression of its opinion. Furthermore, it is questionable under the Bill of Attainder Clause of the Constitution (Article I, Section 9, clause 3), whether Congress may, in any event, inflict a mandatory “penalty” or “punishment” upon the President, or upon any other specified executive official, by means of a legislative act, other than through impeachment.<sup>27</sup> The provision of the Constitution forbidding Congress from adopting “bills of attainder” is directed at what are generally described as legislative punishments.<sup>28</sup> It may be instructive to note that in discussing the impeachment

---

<sup>26</sup> Cushing, The Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies in the United States of America [Lex Parliamentaria Americana], Section 676, at 266-267 (Boston 1856).

<sup>27</sup> In the case of impeachment and conviction, the Constitution provides that the punishment of a civil officer by the Congress may extend only to removal from office, and additionally, a disqualification from holding federal office. Article I, Section 3, clause 7. (It may also be worthy of note that removal of the President from office under the impeachment process has collateral statutory consequences such as the loss of benefits under the Former Presidents Act, 3 U.S.C. § 102 note.) In addition to impeachment (and discipline of its own Members), there is a recognized, inherent authority for the Congress, like other democratic legislative institutions, to take measures, such as in contempt proceedings, to protect the safety, integrity and privileges of the institution, its Members and proceedings.

<sup>28</sup> Article I, Section 9, clause 3: “No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.” A bill of attainder is “a law that legislatively determines guilt and inflicts punishment upon an identified individual without the provisions of the protections of a judicial trial.” Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425, 468 (1977); Selective Service System v. Minnesota Public Interest Research Group, 468 U.S. 841, 847 (1984); see discussion in Constitution of the United States of America, Analysis and Interpretation, Senate Document No. 103-6, 103rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 347-350 (1996). A law that is punitive, that is, intended to punish an individual or specified individuals, rather than intended as a regulatory, prophylactic measure to protect the public, falls within the bill of attainder prohibition. See United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437 (1965), and discussion in SBC Communications, Inc. et al. v. US West Communications Inc., No. 98-10140 (5th Cir., September 4, 1998). In addition to bill of attainder issues, an additional or increased “penalty” or “punishment” imposed by the legislature for an act which has already been provisions of the Constitution at the Convention of 1787, George Mason had recommended expanding the grounds for impeachment beyond merely “treason” and “bribery,” to “maladministration,” indicating that without such broadening of the grounds for impeachment, the Bill of Attainder Clause of the Constitution might otherwise bar Congress from dealing with many “great and dangerous offenses” which do not rise to or constitute bribery or treason.<sup>29</sup> Under the Bill of Attainder Clause, the Congress may generally not levy a legislative punishment, such as a mandatory fine, upon a specified individual (who is not a Member of Congress), nor adopt a punitive measure, for example, in the form of a legislative prohibition on the payment of salaries to certain specified officials in the Government.<sup>30</sup>

(continued...)

There may be some argument that a public rebuke, such as a censure, because of the potential for damage to one’s reputation and possible political or other public aspirations may, in itself, constitute a “punishment” by the Congress, and thus, since not expressly authorized, would fall within those legislative punishments prohibited by the Bill of Attainder Clause.<sup>31</sup> It may be argued that the intent of such a censure would appear to be punitive. However, there remain substantial questions of whether a censure adopted in its traditional form as a simple (or even a concurrent resolution), with no binding effect and stating only an opinion, qualifies as a “bill of attainder,” - since it is not a law and does not have the force or effect of law.<sup>32</sup> Furthermore, it is committed might raise questions under the ex post facto provision. See Hiss v. Hampton, 338 F. Supp. 1141, 1153 (D.D.C. 1972).

---

<sup>28</sup>(...continued)

<sup>29</sup> 2 Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 550, September 8, 1787: “Why is the provision restrained to Treason & bribery only? Treason as defined in the Constitution will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. ... As bills of attainder which have saved the British Constitution are forbidden, it is the more necessary to extend the power of impeachments.” The suggested language was opposed by James Madison, who argued that the term “maladministration” was “so vague” that it would be “equivalent” to the President having only “tenure during pleasure of the Senate.” Id. at 550. The compromise language of “other high crimes & misdemeanors” was substituted by Col. Mason, and adopted. Id. at 550.

<sup>30</sup> In United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303 (1946), an appropriations rider was struck down by the Supreme Court as a bill of attainder where the legislative language forbade the use of money to pay the salaries of three persons in an agency whom the House had wanted removed from Government service because they were thought “subversive.”

<sup>31</sup> See, for example, James Madison’s discussion of a legislative “denunciation” as a punishment for constitutional purposes, 4 Annals of Congress 934, cited in US West Communications Inc., supra, at note 17.

<sup>32</sup> In Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, supra at 468, the Supreme Court described a bill of attainder as “a law that legislatively determines guilt and inflicts punishment upon an identified individual ....” (emphasis added). In United States v. Lovett, supra, the Supreme Court noted that bills of attainder are “legislative acts, no matter what their form,” that inflict legislative punishments on individuals. 328 U.S. at 315 (emphasis added). The Court there, however, was making this point to explain that the Clause applies to appropriations acts (passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by the President), as well as to a permanent law. 328 U.S. at 315-316.

questionable whether even a formal, public expression of opinion and disapproval by the legislature is, in any event, a “punishment” contemplated by the provision.<sup>33</sup>

As to finis and bills of attainder (and ex post facto laws), it may be noted that in some instances the courts have found that certain civil fines and forfeitures were “remedial” measures and not “punitive,” so as not to violate the ex post facto provision or the Excessive Fines Clause.<sup>34</sup> It may be possible under this analysis to argue that certain fines or required “restitutions” of funds to the Government may also not be punitive under the Bill of Attainder Clause, as long as they merely “reimburse the government for investigative and prosecutorial cost.”<sup>35</sup> Any argument of this nature in the instance at hand, however, would also face the task of overcoming express statements by individual Members concerning the appropriate “punishment” in this particular case, as well as the inference that a mandatory “fine” or required restitution that accompanies or is coupled with a “censure” or other explicit statement of disapproval, directed at one specified individual, may appear in that context to be indicative of a punitive legislative intent, rather than merely a remedial one.<sup>36</sup>

Diminution of Salary

It has also been postulated that a provision of law which fines, or requires monetary restitution from the President might, in effect, be a diminution of the salary of the President, in contravention of Article II, Section 1, clause 7, of the Constitution.<sup>37</sup> Proponents of this theory cite to the cases concerning the similar constitutional limitations on the diminution of salary of federal judges during their tenure in office, which have demonstrated that even some “indirect” lessening of judicial compensation, such as by the imposition of a new tax after judges have taken

---

<sup>33</sup> Note historical judicial construction of the term “punishment.” Ex Parte Garland, 71 U.S. 333 (1866); Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U.S. 277, 320 (1866): “the deprivation of any rights, civil or political, previously enjoyed ...” See generally, EEOC v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 504 F. Supp. 241 (D.C. Ill. 1980); note discussion in Artway v. Attorney General of New Jersey, 876 F. Supp. 666, aff’d in part, vacated in part, 81 F.3d 1235, 1253-1263 (3rd Cir. 1996), rehearing den., 83 F.3d 594 (3rd Cir. 1996).

<sup>34</sup> United States v. Halper, 490 U.S. 435, 445-446 (1989); Karpa v. C.I.R., 909 F.2d 784 (9th Cir. 1990), noting the non-penal nature of fines which are not “overwhelmingly disproportionate” to the damages caused to the Government and thus not so “divorced from the Government’s damages and expenses to constitute punishment.” 909 F. 2d at 788, citing Halper, supra; Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602 (1993); U.S. v. Certain Funds Contained in Account Nos., 96 F.3d 20 (2nd Cir. 1996), cert. den. 117 S.Ct. 954 (1997).

<sup>35</sup> Karpa, supra at 788, citing Halper, supra at 445-446, n. 6.

<sup>36</sup> See discussion of congressional intent and “intent of Members of Congress who voted its passage,” in determining whether a measure is punitive or merely remedial or regulatory in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. supra at 473-484. Also in United States v. Lovett, supra at 313, the Court looked not only to the “section’s language,” but “the circumstances of its passage” as well, as indicative of Congress’ intent.

<sup>37</sup> “The President shall, at stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected ....”

office, may work to diminish the over-all compensation of those federal judges as contemplated by that provision of the Constitution.<sup>38</sup> There is no precedent which makes it clear or provides a definitive ruling as to whether a mandatory “fine” or required “restitution” directed at a particular officer would be a diminution of salary under the Constitution. It may be noted that the fine or restitution to the Government could be paid out of funds other than the President’s salary or compensation (such as from private contributions or loans); however, it is a new financial obligation to the United States Government placed by the Congress upon the funds available to the President during his term (and is not an application of a pre-existing provision of law or regulation, or merely an increase in current, existing financial obligations), and is a reduction which would be applied directly and solely to the President.

Voluntary Acceptance of Recommended Penalty

It would appear to be within the realm of possibility, although without apparent precedent, that the President might voluntarily agree not to challenge the authority and constitutionality of a particular legislative action or statement, and might voluntarily agree to pay a “suggested” monetary amount as a fine or restitution along with a “censure,” or to accept some other form of contrition or expiation suggested by Congress in a sense of Congress resolution. If the payment of restitution or a fine is merely incorporated into a legislative vehicle such as a simple or a concurrent resolution, which is merely a statement of opinion by or “sense of” the Congress, and which therefore is not binding and does not have force or effect of law, it may be argued that such a legislative measure would not be a “bill of attainder,” nor a diminution of salary, since it is not a law, is not mandatory, nor enforceable.<sup>39</sup>

In any event, if the President agrees to abide by the “suggestion” or opinion, or even if such formulation were incorporated into a mandatory fine or other legislative vehicle with the force and effect of law with the President’s agreement, the question would still be raised as to who, if anyone, would have legal standing to challenge a legislative act if the person affected or aggrieved by the act does not challenge it. Standing to challenge a congressional act in the courts requires a showing that the plaintiff has an injury in fact as a result of the challenged action.<sup>40</sup> A Member of Congress does not necessarily have any additional standing beyond a member of the

---

<sup>38</sup> Evans v. Gore, 253 U.S. 245 (1920); Hatter v. United States, 64 F.3d 647 (Fed. Cir. 1995), affirmed, United States v. Hatter, 117 S.Ct. 39 (1996); on remand to the Federal Court of Claims, the court found, as a factual matter, that subsequent increases in judicial salaries had made up for any diminution of over-all compensation of federal judges caused by application of new Social Security and Medicare taxes on salaries of sitting federal judges. 38 Fed.Cl. 166 (1997). As to the President, see 13 Ops. Atty. Gen. 161 (1869).

<sup>39</sup> See footnote 32, supra.

<sup>40</sup> Association of Data Processing Service Organizations v. Camp, 397 U.S. 150, 152 (1970). “In order to meet the standing element of the case-or-controversy requirement, appellees must allege a personal injury that is particularized, concrete, and otherwise judicially cognizable.” Raines v. Byrd, 117 S.Ct. 2312, 2313 (1997), citing Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555 (1992), and Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737 (1984). Standing does not turn on the merits of complaint, but whether the plaintiff has a legal right to a judicial determination of the issues raised. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968).

public to challenge a legislative act based merely on an arguable institutional injury or loss of political power, unless there is some personal injury to the legislator, such as where a legislator's vote would be "completely nullified."<sup>41</sup>

Legal issues and questions of legal standing aside, there are also potentially important policy implications which the Congress may wish to consider. On the one hand, an agreement or deal where the President of the United States voluntarily accepts a "censure" vote of the Congress (either through a simple or concurrent resolution, or through a joint resolution which the President signs to indicate his acceptance), or a censure "plus" some other act of contrition, might arguably provide for an appropriate public consequence to the acts of a President which, while found either highly offensive or even illegal, might not be considered by Congress to constitute "treason," "bribery" or other "high crimes or misdemeanors." It might be argued that a censure and/or other "punishment" recommended and agreed to by the President would allow for a formal, public statement by the representatives of the American people indicating strong disapproval of such conduct, without subjecting the country to as wrenching and disruptive a process as impeachment and an attempt to remove a democratically elected President.

However, on the other hand, it might be argued that action of this nature, even merely a "censure" of a President, is an extra-constitutional measure not contemplated by the express provisions nor the design of the Constitution. As to legislative "punishments" outside of impeachments, it may be noted that the Bill of Attainder Clause was an intentional limitation on congressional powers to punish specified individuals, based on due process and separation of powers concerns. Additionally, the diminution of salary provision was adopted within the Constitution's separation of powers framework, and among its checks and balances, to ensure the independence of the Executive from the Congress.<sup>42</sup> It has thus been argued that even if not technically a bill of attainder nor a diminution of salary, and/or even if unchallenged by the subject of the fine or similar congressional "punishment," such action might establish a precedent for future actions, threats of large monetary fines, or "agreements" (into which a President may be pressured by the specter of impeachment proceedings) which could tend to interfere with or upset to some degree the balance <sup>41</sup> In Raines v. Byrd, supra, plaintiff Senators alleged that the line-item veto alters the "constitutional balance of powers" between the President and Congress, as well as altering the "legal and practical effect" of their votes, and divests Members of their constitutional role in the repeal of legislation. 117 S.Ct. at 2316. The Court found, however, that plaintiff Senators did not have legal standing to challenge the legislation, as there was no personal injury, but only a "loss of political power." 117 S.Ct at 2318.

---

<sup>42</sup> See Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Vol 2, at §1486, pp. 311-312 (1873): "It is obvious that, without due attention to the proper support of the President, the separation of the executive from the legislative department would be merely nominal and nugatory. The legislature, with a discretionary power over his salary and emolument, would soon render him obsequious to their will. ... The legislature, upon the appointment of a President, is once for all to declare what shall be the compensation for his services during the time for which he shall have been elected. This done, they will have no power to alter it, either by increase or diminution.... They can neither weaken his fortitude by operating upon his necessities, nor corrupt his integrity by appealing to his avarice."

contemplated in the Constitution in the relationship between the Executive and the Congress.

Learn how Capitol Hill really works

All of our programs and any combination of their topics can be tailored for on-site training for your organization.

For more than 40 years, TheCapitol.Net and its predecessor, Congressional Quarterly Executive Conferences, have been teaching professionals from government, military, business, and NGOs about the dynamics and operations of the legislative and executive branches and how to work with them.

Our custom, on-site training and publications include congressional operations, legislative and budget process, communication and advocacy, media and public relations, research, testifying before Congress, legislative drafting, critical thinking and writing, and more.

- Diverse Client Base—We have tailored hundreds of custom on-site training programs for Congress, numerous agencies in all federal departments, the military, law firms, lobbying firms, unions, think tanks and NGOs, foreign delegations, associations and corporations, delivering exceptional insight into how Washington works.™
- Experienced Program Design and Delivery—We have designed and delivered hundreds of custom programs covering congressional/legislative operations, budget process, media training, writing skills, legislative drafting, advocacy, research, testifying before Congress, grassroots, and more.
- Professional Materials—We provide training materials and publications that show how Washington works. Our publications are designed both as course materials and as invaluable reference tools.
- Large Team of Experienced Faculty—More than 150 faculty members provide independent subject matter expertise. Each program is designed using the best faculty member for each session.
- Non-Partisan—TheCapitol.Net is non-partisan.
- GSA Schedule—TheCapitol.Net is on the GSA Schedule, 874-4, for custom on-site training: GSA Contract GS02F0192X.

Please see our Capability Statement on our web site at TCNCS.com.

Custom training programs are designed to meet your educational and training goals, each led by independent subject-matter experts best qualified to help you reach your educational objectives and align with your audience.

As part of your custom program, we can also provide classroom space, breaks and meals, receptions, tours, and online registration and individual attendee billing services.

For more information about custom on-site training for your organization, please see our web site: TCNCustom.com or call us: 202-678-1600, ext 115.

TheCapitol.Net

Non-partisan training and publications that show how Washington works.™

PO Box 25706, Alexandria, VA 22313-5706
202-678-1600 • www.thecapitol.net

TheCapitol.Net is on the
GSA Schedule, 874-4,
for custom on-site training.
GSA Contract GS02F0192X

